Large galaxies and strong gravitational lensing are the key to the study of the Hubble Constant. In the first paper, the authors find that for example, the Fornax cluster has an Hubble constant of 75 km/s/Mpc, and an error of 10 percent.

Upon reading this paper, one can't help but think, "This looks like a zigzag." As the authors of this paper are in the distributional approach, they provided a confidence interval for the distribution that is not an interval. At first place the authors appear to be doing a good job, but this is a zigzag if you are not paying attention.
